NATURAL SOAP WELLS. Boiling springs have lately been discovered in the New World possessing a hitherto unknown peculiarity. The world or reservoir has, floating on the surface of the heated water, an oily or soapy substance, which can easily be skimmed off. This hardens gradually on exposure to the air and forms a material, exactly the same, both in chemical composition and the uses to which it can be applied, as the ordinary soap of commerce. The Dakota natural soap wells are a mixture of lubricating oil, alkali, and borax. One reservoir of the soapy stuff has been already utilised by an enterprising American, who owns the and on which it has been found. He has submitted a sample to the manager of a large Chicago soapboiling firm, and it is asserted that the natural soap now discovered is worth the full weight of the manufactured article. It would be premature to express an opinion as to the ultimate commercial value of this natural soap, but the fact remains that for some time past the people living near these Dakota springs have employed the oily substance ladled from the surface as a lubricant. Natural soaps of vegetable origin are found in Jamaica, the West Indies and the Spanish islands. They are apt, after a time, ands. They are apt, after a time, Young Cator by name, was shipped like the cheaper grades of manufactor by the W. G. Hall this morning. It tured soap, to injure both the skin and the texture of the clothes washed with their aid. If the product of the Dakota soap wells turns out to be free from this deleterious quality it may before long oust the manufactured article from the markets of the world .- [Home News.
